Ann Crittenden, award-winning journalist, author, and lecturer, will discuss whether working mothers have many choices when it comes to how they balance supporting their families and caring for their children. She will offer several suggestions for how the public and private sector could work to acknowledge the value and importance of raising children.

This is the fourth in a series of five briefings exploring challenges facing working families in the United States and discussing policy solutions. The next briefing will be held on October 12.
